1. Write short notes on the following:

1. Expressing feelings in everyday conversation.

Answer

Feelings form an important part of our everyday conversations. We talk not only to share facts but also to tell others how we feel. A person may be pleased about a good result, worried about a family member, disappointed by a cancelled plan, or grateful for a small kindness. Expressing these feelings clearly helps others understand us and respond appropriately. For example, saying, “I am a little nervous about the interview,” is more useful than remaining silent and expecting a friend to guess what is wrong.

Different situations require different words and tones. We can express happiness by saying, “That is wonderful news!” or “I am so glad for you.” For sadness, we might say, “I have been feeling low today.” When we are upset, a calm statement such as “I felt hurt when you interrupted me” is more constructive than shouting, “You never listen.” Polite expressions such as “I appreciate your help” and “I am sorry I spoke rudely” also strengthen relationships. Everyday English becomes more effective when words suit the occasion and the listener.

Our face, posture and voice support what we say. A genuine smile communicates pleasure, while a gentle voice can show sympathy. However, body language may be misunderstood, especially when people come from different backgrounds. Therefore, it is better to explain important feelings in simple words rather than rely only on gestures. We should also respect another person's feelings. Listening without laughing at someone's fear or dismissing their disappointment makes a conversation safe and meaningful. Being honest, courteous and sensitive helps us express emotions without hurting others.

2. Family and social relationships.

Answer

Family and social relationships give people affection, support and a sense of belonging. Family members may include parents, children, brothers, sisters, grandparents and relatives. Our wider social circle includes friends, classmates, neighbours and colleagues. These relationships influence our habits, attitudes and emotional well-being. They become stronger when people care for one another and communicate regularly, even during busy periods.

In family life, small acts often matter more than expensive gifts. Helping an elderly relative, sharing household responsibilities, eating together and discussing problems patiently can build trust. Younger members should be able to express their opinions respectfully, while elders can offer guidance without
